Not illustrated. 1900 edition. Excerpt: ... CHAPTER XI The Empress And Roman Catholicism--the Empress And Beneficence--Personal Impression--The Last Meeting June 16th, 1871, the troops made their entry into Berlin, headed by the Emperor on horseback, accompanied by the Crown Prince and Princes Frederick Charles, Bismarck, Moltke, and Roon, and followed by the Empress and Princesses in carriages, drawn by six horses. 42,000 soldiers decorated with garlands of oak leaves, formed the procession which defiled under triumphal arches, and halted on the square where was unveiled on this same day, the equestrian statue of Frederick William III. The joy of victory had succeeded to the awful loss of human life, and the hardships of war. Millions of francs were pouring into the land from France, and with giddy rapidity Berlin blossomed forth from a moderate capital into a city of a million inhabitants. The lust of building seized all classes and engaged both small and great in wild speculation. A peasant in Schoneberg became a threefold millionaire, by the sale of a plot of land on which a suburb of villa residences was rapidly mapped out; journeymen masons drove in first class cabs rather than go on foot, and drank champagne instead of their accustomed pint of beer. But one fine morning people woke from their illusion to find that the fever of speculation had ended in bankruptcy. Old commercial houses, apparently founded upon a rock, cracked and tottered, then collapsed. Taxes pressed heavily, trade and industry were approaching a standstill, and disputes at home followed hard upon victories abroad, which naturally tended to drive the millions of France from the country as rapidly as they had come in. The Jews had been the promoters of these wild speculations which now excited the anger...
