

MacArthurs ULTRA: Codebreaking and the War against Japan, 1942-1945 (Modern War Studies) (Modern War Studies (Paperback))

Cracking the enemys radio code is a task so urgent and so difficult that it demands the militarys best minds and most sophisticated technology. But when the coded messages are in a language as complex as Japanese, decoding problems multiply dramatically. It took the U.S. Army a full two years after the attack on Pearl Harbor to break the codes of the Japanese Imperial Army. But by 1944 the U.S. was decoding more than 20,000 messages a month filled with information about enemy movements, strategy, fortifications, troop strengths, and supply convoys. In MacArthurs ULTRA, historian Edward Drea recounts the story behind the Armys painstaking decryption operation and its dramatic breakthrough. He demonstrates how ULTRA (intelligence from decrypted Japanese radio communications) shaped MacArthurs operations in New Guinea and the Philippines and its effect on the outcome of World War II. From sources on both sides of the Pacific and national security agency declassified records, Drea has compiled a detailed listing of the ULTRA intelligence available to MacArthur. By correlating the existing intelligence with MacArthurs operational decisions, Drea shows how MacArthur used and misused intelligence information. He tells for the first time the story behind MacArthurs bold leap to Hollandia in 1944 and shows how ULTRA revealed the massive Japanese mobilization for what might have been (had it occurred) the bloodiest and most protracted engagement of the entire war the Allied invasion of Japan. Drea also clarifies the role of ULTRA in Trumans decision to drop atomic bombs on Japan in 1945, and concludes that ULTRA shortened the war by six to ten months.
